lents theatres do not pay without Colleen-Bawnish leaps and hideons death escapes, and the worst feature of it all is that the newspapers evidently foster this tendency by this going abroad to out of the way place (we have just read a terrific balloon voyage of two corpses) is unnecessary, and we can assure our readers that by looking around a assure our readers that by looking around a little at home, stories unimpeachably true, indeed glowing with veracity, may be met with, easily substantiated, and correct in the minutest detail. With this view we subjoin an incident from the life of a Nanaimo tarmer, hastily gathered from a friend to whom he related the account of his sufferings and PLOATING IN THE AIR-MANIACAL

MISERY. The beautiful village of Nansimo was thrown into fearful excitement some weeks past, by an accident which, at the time, it was supposed had deprived of life Mr. Mason, one of the most enterprising farmers of our island. Mr. M. being anxious to secure his cattle against injury from the approaching winter flood, went down to the lower part of his ranch, accompanied only by his dog. It seems there was an old well some three or four hundred feet deep, which he had dug one day for amusement, without, however, finding water. Whilst walking along carelessly, and nacupied in meteorological observations, before he was aware of its vicinity he approached the fatal hole, and in less than a second was falling to the bottom. For some minutes he lay stunned, and on returning to consciousness found he had sustained the mest fearful injuries to his thumb, which he felt must be either sprained or out of joint. Far above, like a speck in the sky, peering into the darkness, stood Mason's dog, whining niteously, and several times his master felt a tear (ouce hot, but chilled in its descent) fall on his tace. As if by instinct, the faithful animal seemed at once to com-The beautiful village of Nanaimo was the faithful animal seemed at once to con the faithful animal seemed at once to comprehend the situation, and rushing at full speed to his master's home, by his barking and whining convinced his mistress that something serious had happened. It was the work of but a short half hour to reach t'e apot, and soon the whole neighborhood was in attendance with ropes and pulleys. A thick cable was lowered and the unfortunate man could be distinctly felt grasping it with convulsive energy, and endeavoring to fasten himself to it. The injury however to his thumb, which was now commencing to swell, rendered all efforts futile, and night was closing is and the knot which he feebly to swell, rendered all efforts futile, and night was closing is and the knot which he feebly tried to the in the dark had again giv. a way for the hundreth time. All this time the water in the neighboring river was rapidly rising and it became evident that return to the house would shortly be impossible. The wretched wife in the depths of her desnair as her friends forced her gently from the spot broke with a shriek of agony from the neighbors that held her and would have joined her husband for ever in death had not the curve of her full sized grecian bend resolutely refused to descend and kept her suspended over the aperture. A pair of bellows had been lowered by the advice of a student from San Francisco, with the idea that at so great a Francisco, with the idea that at so great a depth, - Mason could easily exhaust the air and by that means rise to the surface. Alas

a woollen comforter had been lowered to him by his loving wife, now lying alas! insensi-ble from grief of the drawing room sola ble from grief on the drawing room sofa. The wind was raging and the water rising every hour. It was very wet. It was very cold. He was alone. He slept. The trick ling of the flood as it meandered down the old dry well tiled to awake him. It was pirch dark. There was no light Nothing was visible. There was no light Nothing was visible. There was a foot of water in the well and still he slumbered. As the water reached his mouth, which was open, it poured in was if in pity, and awoke him. Grasping the hellows and buttoning the sardines under bis wasteoat (now also, no longer white) he endeavoured with all his might to keep his only means of safety inflated. He found that with difficulty he could use his thumb, and hastily closing his lips over the iron mouth of the bellows he pumped in the air. He felt he was swelling. He felt he was rising. Rising, ab whither I He knew not. An hour or more he rose, and rose, when at last the cold blast of fresh air that blew on his face told him he was out of the well and floating, in the dark, dark, a the well and floating in the dark, dark, dreary flood. Sometimes a blow from a tree hurried down the torrent still showed him that the flood was rising yet. He tasted the that the flood waterising yet. He tasted the water, it was very tresh. Still dark and still floating full of air. He tasted the water it was very brackish. He tasted the water it was very salt. Would the day never break? When night is darkest dawn is nearest. The day broke, and he was alone. Alone in the ocean, sea and waves on all sides. Where was the land? It was ont of sight. He tried to sing "Rocked in the Cradle of the deep," but his voice was too wet and he could make no sound. The sardines! He felt for them, they were safe, and a thrill of joy thrilled joyously in his bosom. He felt it thrill—it was very thrilling. Gently he tore open the sardines with his teeth, and ate one. He counted them, there were tourteen, all in oil, sardines with his teeth, and ate one. He counted them, there were fourteen, all in oil, (not water colored); stil floating, and still no sign of land. The air that he had pumped in kept him sitting in the water up to his maier, and he laine back a little he could raise one chilled leg at a time and dry it a little in the sus. A fearful thirst came upon him, and the water was all salt. The sardines were salt and only maddened his poor dry parched up throat. Suddenly he remembered his inside pocket on the right hand side. It was was full of fresh water which had trickled into it when sleepwater which had trickled into it when eleep-ing in the well. There was about a pint. His little allowance lasted him for thirty-six ing in the well. There was about a pint. His little allowance lasted him for thirty-six hours, by dividing into six drops at a time, and on the fourth day he had still a sardine left, but no water. Experience had taught him that water may be condensed, and acting on his little chemical knowledge, he filled his bellows with the salt water and forced the steam into the sir was enabled to eatch the freshened stream in his mouth as it descended and slake his thirst. On the fifth day towards noon he saw a faint curl of smoke, but the steamer, if such it was, came no nearer. He fried to take an observation by shutting one eye, in the absence of a quadrant, and as near as he could calculate was in lat. 23.36, W., long. 180.64, N.

Death now seemed very near, he was took exhausted to use the bellows either for seif infistion or condensing, and the air in him could only last a few hours. He discovered to his horror that his bellows had spring a leak, and the combination of misery rendered him delirious. He says he remembers no more until he found himself lying on the deck of the Black Diamond, Onpiain Rudlin, in the arms of the book who was pouring essence of beef into his ear. The Captain declined to take any passage mosey from him, and at his own request, landed him in Cadboro' Bay. A horror of his story becoming public prevented him from sppearing in the city, and he implored the search of the few to whom
